Terms are acquired habits of distinguishing things from each other.

Seeing something as something.

Knowledge is developed within a common framework and has a social origin, a social utility.

It is neutral neither in its origin nor in its effect; it reflects the bias of a particular social order.

I see who and what my mind finds plausible

Whatever I experience, I experience by aligning it with an internal model of the world.

Influences from the outside world are influenced by our stored image, our memories.

These include preconceptions and prejudices that interpret and fill in the messages.

Identifying them with our own interests as we feel and conceive them.

Our brain searches for causality, cause and effect. Our mind assumes that our environment follows certain patterns, continuous, measurable and Predictable.

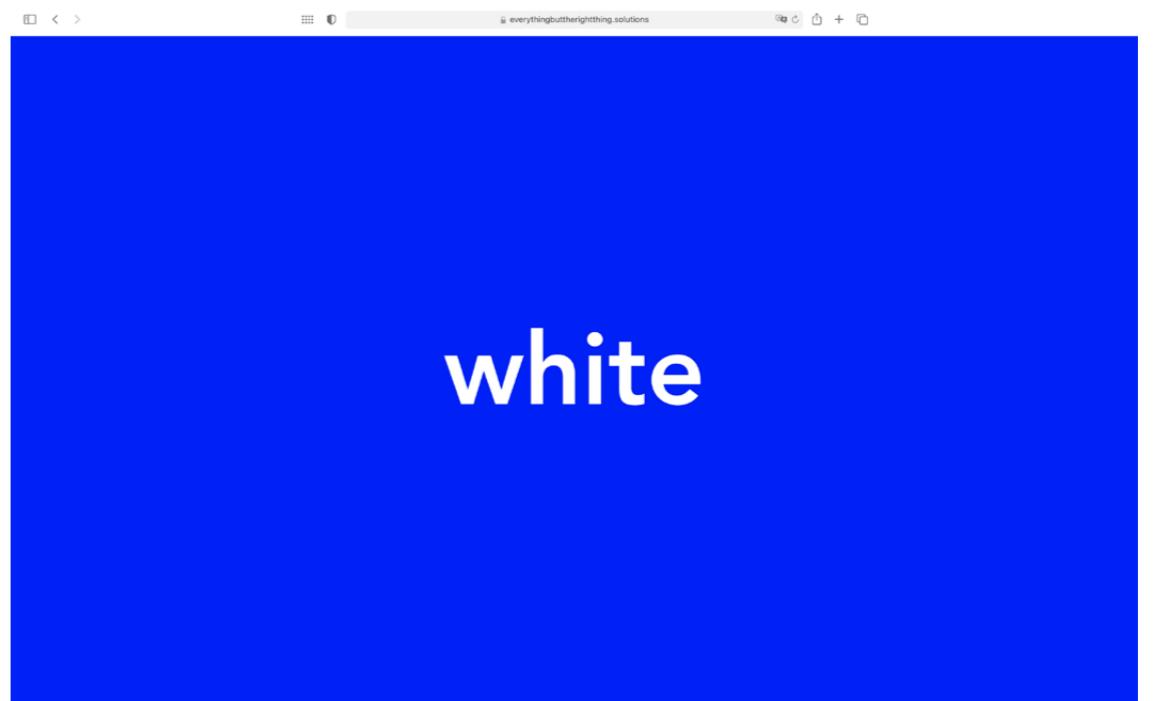

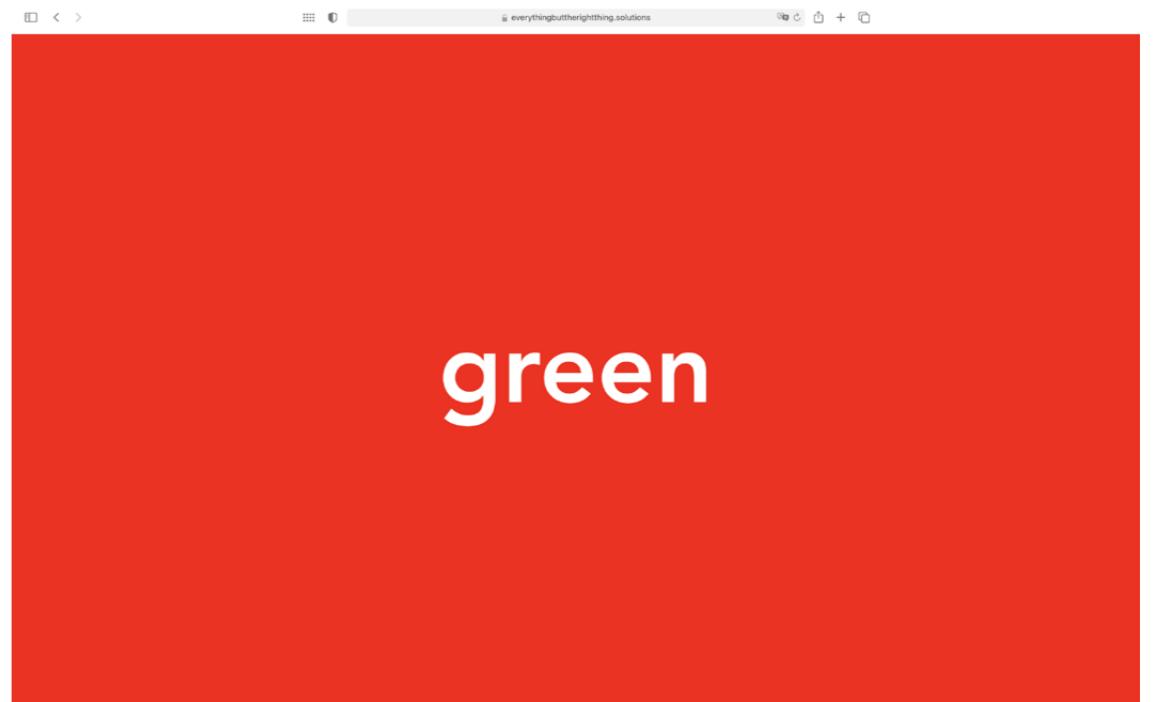

We have a need for meaning, causality provides this meaning. A sense that we can understand and comprehend.

This allows us to explain and structure our environment, which gives us a sense of orientation and security.

We have the desire for a reliable environment, which thereby becomes predictable and readable and thus seems controllable. We do so by simplifying, generalising and often absolutising.

Shared fictions that become reality.

The only condition: the majority must believe in it.

Material: lacquered metal or porcelain, depending on the model

The values, meanings and ethical presuppositions that every member of community inherits, that become judgments we make without much reflection. What we call „common sense“ becomes the common ground of truth, with „truth“ as the community's judgment about practical needs and choices.

doing reality; human being as second-order chaotic system

collective zukunft_schoch

Authors are following the action at the vernissage via a live broadcast. They are located in a separate room, which is neither accessible nor visible to visitors.

The writer chooses a figure (a visitor), a grouping, the action as a whole, etc. and „maintains“ their presence.

The text is transferred to several screens located in the exhibition space.

The temporary protagonists (visitors) are thus constantly given a new role. Reading a new, fictitious interpretation of their behaviour, assertions about their actions, their being, their thoughts and intentions, which merges with the actual presence experienced and undermine the idiosyncrasy of the place and the occasion.

The aim of the work is to create an oscillating relationship between observer and protagonist in which the protagonist or the observer becomes aware of the assertion about his person.

We change reality through observation, description and assertion.

Our reality is formed by a historical narrative that we are telling ourselves and the resulting prognosis of the future.

The visitor finds himself in a setting in which he experiences himself as a second-order chaotic system. In contrast to a chaotic system of the first order, a chaotic system of the second order is influenced by prediction, in this case the narrative of the author. It goes so far that already the idea of an observer has influence on his behavior.

Within the situation, the visitor embodies all roles; protagonist, observer, and author in the sense of actor with a free will. A kind of echo or feedback system is created.

The levels of observation and prediction are superimposed, as the actorial level lies over the situation, the viewer recognizes others as protagonists and others perceive him as protagonists. But he himself remains capable of action and can in turn influence the situation.

The intersubjective reality changes wherever this work takes place.

Four voices (Petra, Anna, Markus, Yanick) of the mac voiceover program are discussing.

A cube made out of translucent masking foil is centred in the exhibition space.

The moving image is projected from inside the cube onto the cubes wall (painter's masking foil).

Each of the four voices is speaking over a loudspeaker. The loudspeaker are mounted on to the walls of the exhibition room (one speaker per wall, one voice per speaker).
